I heard a phrase in a movie: "Every person has a right to dance."

Each and every one of us is an individual, everyone carries another "me" within themselves, maybe even a third one, a fourth one, and a fifth one. Everyone has a right to release the one that requires to be set free, that wants and is able to say what they have inside. Therefore – it's time to dance.

We're often preoccupied by different thoughts – either heavier or lighter. This is a battle of a human with his another "me". This unexpected rush is not easy to explain to yourself, but oftentimes we haven't even started to wish for something before we already forbid it for ourselves.

Sometimes some weird urges occur, and we can't even say where do they come from; but even this is one of our "me's" that has awakened and is thinking its own thoughts.

Where do our thoughts come from? I think that being able to follow and understand what lies beneath them and to realize your potential in the present is an art.

The series of paintings "It's Time to Dance" is a story about a battle between two beginnings, the masculine and the feminine. These are not simply women's figures, they capture an attempt to teach those beginnings to interact with each other, to live in peace with themselves.

I'm not offering a treatment, I'm offering a solution. To live here and now, to live in the moment. And the very moment you stumble upon a question: "What should I do?", you'll have an answer: "It's time to dance!".
